How-to address the OWASP Top 10 with Oracle ADF

In the following, this paper addresses the OWASP Top 10 security vulnerabilities in the order they appear in the OWASP document published for the year 2013

OWASP #1 - SQL Injection

All data input that define or modify server-side queries to a system must be validated to avoid the risk of SQL injection. Note the use of the word system instead of application for this requirement. Nowadays, the term application no longer sufficiently describes the boundaries of where user interaction starts and where it ends. Different access channels may be used independently to query and write the application data. For example, Web Services may be used from mobile frontends, whereas direct SQL and PL/SQL statements may be used from Oracle Application Express (APEX) or SOA may use the database adapter to access the database as part of a business process. All of these channels need to be protected against SQL injection attacks. ADF can contribute to this protection by ensuring the ADF Business Component model is secured against SQL query manipulation.

Validate user input

The best place to protect against SQL injection is at the point where the query is defined, which in ADF mostly is the ADF Business Components business service layer. In situations where the application developer does not control the business service layer used with Oracle ADF, for example when using services, you can only hope that the web service model mitigates the risk and assist with client side validation added to those input fields that directly feed into web services calls.

With Oracle ADF there are several layers for you to perform user input validation and most of them are explained in more detailed in the section that discusses OWASP #3 – Cross-Site Scripting (XSS).

Commonly, SQL injection attempts are detected by comparing user provided input against a list of known SQL expressions allowed within the specific context. The technique in which user input is validated against a list of allowed values and keywords is known as whitelisting. The counterpart of whitelisting is blacklisting. In blacklisting user input is checked against a list of values and keys that are not allowed in a specific context.

Note that usually whitelisting is preferred because if it fails it doesn't open a security hole and instead most likely only annoy the application user who tried a valid SQL keyword that however is missing in the list.

User input comparison to white- or blacklists are through regular expression validation, which you can add to ADF Faces components and the ADF binding layer.

Hint: It does not make sense to validate all user input fields against SQL injection. Data input that is only persisted in the database but not executed does not cause harm even if the provided input contains SQL keywords. It's your responsibility as a security aware developer to identify areas that require SQL injection protection and to add protection.
